The label is partnering with British media and telecommunications conglomerate Sky Group to create a new take on an existing Smart TV model. Debuted last month during Dolce & Gabbana's Alta Moda fashion week events, the 65-inch Sky Glass Carretto Siciliano, which extends the maison's classic print onto a brand-new medium, will feature a limited-edition run.

Craftsmanship and artistry

Hand-painted by an artisan based in Palermo, Italy, Dolce & Gabbana's latest electronic selection taps a familiar design, elevating a line of hardware that is itself new to the market. Traditional geometric patterns inspired by Western Sicily and as seen upon adjacent interior product lines adorn a special version of a relatively new release from Sky Glass.

Launched in Italy last September, Sky Glass's latest release is rendered the world's first carbon-neutral-certified television by London-based environmental services company Climate Impact Partners. According to the brand, the model "integrates Sky's content, major free-to-air channels, and streaming apps within a single interface."

Dolce & Gabbana's remake builds on this streamlined composition.

Each part of the Sky Glass Carretto Siciliano is meticulously hand-painted, from the bezels around the screen to the entire back end of the model. Replacing the usual Sky insignia on the front of the unit is now a Dolce & Gabbana icon, also intricately handcrafted and seamlessly applied.

The forthcoming model is set to hit stores soon, as Dolce & Gabbana move full steam ahead on other household appliances.

Earlier on in the season, the fashion staple partnered with Italian appliance company Smeg to bring a collection of appliances covered in its "Blu Mediterraneo" vision to market (see story).
